BoJack Horseman's eleventh episode, "It's You That Went Well," showcases a pivotal moment in BoJack's journey towards redemption. In this episode, BoJack reunites with Sarah Lynn, who has been sober for nearly nine months, and they indulge in a night of partying and reminiscing about their past. However, things take a turn when BoJack's blackouts cause him to lose control, leading them to attend an AA meeting. During the meeting, BoJack delivers an impassioned speech about his past misdeeds, including his encounters with Charlotte and her family. His words are met with a mix of amusement and discomfort from the audience, but it seems to have a profound impact on Sarah Lynn, who looks up Penny's Facebook profile and discovers she is doing well. The episode marks a poignant moment in BoJack's character development, as he begins to confront his past mistakes and show a glimmer of remorse. Meanwhile, Sarah Lynn struggles with her own demons, highlighting the complexities of their complicated relationship. BoJack is currently dealing with his guilt and seeking redemption by making amends with those he's wronged. Sarah Lynn advises him to try a twelve-step program and make amends to clear his conscience. BoJack decides to start by apologizing to Diane Nguyen and Mr. Peanutbutter, but things don't go as planned when they break into their house and cause chaos. After a series of mishaps, including accidentally breaking Diane's wrist again, BoJack tries to apologize to Todd but ends up apologizing to a little boy who looks like him instead. BoJack then visits Ana Spanakopita, hoping to understand why she left him and won't give them another chance. However, he has a blackout and can't remember the conversation. He returns multiple times, trying to hear her story again, but keeps blacking out. Frustrated, BoJack tries to make amends with Princess Carolyn by screaming apologies outside her apartment building, but she's unimpressed. BoJack eventually returns to Ana's place, apologizing for bothering her and asking her to share her story again. This time, he listens intently as she recounts her near-death experience as a teen lifeguard. She became a lifeguard to never be weaker than water, and her instructor taught her that sometimes people just can't be saved. BoJack doesn't understand the relevance of this story to his own life, but after another blackout, he finds himself driving to Ohio to make amends with Penny. # He seriously messed with her life. BoJack asks Sarah Lynn to turn around, but they end up at her school library instead. They spot Penny using a computer, and BoJack thinks they should leave her alone, but he blacks out again. Later, outside a party Penny's attending, BoJack says she seems fine and maybe he didn't ruin her after all. He agrees to drive Sarah Lynn home, but then bumps into some guys, causing them to topple over. Penny notices him and freaks out, telling him he can't be there. As they leave the party, people start recognizing Sarah Lynn and BoJack, taking pictures of them. Back in the car, Sarah Lynn tells BoJack that Penny was probably doing well before they showed up and they should've just left her alone, which annoys BoJack. Sarah Lynn then finds a bottle opener next to some heroin nicknamed BoJack, which she thinks is a big deal. BoJack doesn't want to shoot heroin, but eventually agrees to snort it like sophisticated adults. After using the drug, he blacks out again and has a flashback to Thanksgiving 2007 at Cuddlywhiskers' house. He reminisces about their time on Horsin' Around and tells Sarah Lynn she's the only one who truly understands him. BoJack and Sarah Lynn then have a series of blackouts that take them to different locations, with BoJack remembering their past together and feeling uneasy about reaching out to Penny, "the world's biggest pop star," for help. BoJack confesses his feelings for Sarah Lynn, stating that their shared past as unknown quantities makes their friendship genuine. The scene shifts to them in a hotel room, where BoJack professes his love, but Sarah Lynn remains unresponsive. She wakes up and expresses boredom before discovering the Oscars are on TV. Overjoyed at winning an Oscar for Best Original Song, she becomes melancholic about missing her award acceptance. Sarah Lynn criticizes herself, claiming that everything about her is fake and not genuine. BoJack attempts to comfort her but Sarah Lynn panics, fearing they're all doomed. He calms her down, and they visit the planetarium where Sarah Lynn says "I wanna be an architect," a childhood aspiration shared with her mother. The narrator reflects on the fleeting nature of human life in comparison to the vast universe. BoJack reassures Sarah Lynn that past actions or remembrance don't matter, only the present moment matters. However, when asked if she agrees, Sarah Lynn remains silent. Visit Princess Carolyn, Ana Spanakopita, Diane, Mr. Peanutbutter, and Penny before heading to Sarah Lynn's favorite spot, Griffith Park Observatory. She adores the dome shape, which allows her to gaze into the planetarium sky with BoJack. However, a dark twist unfolds - Sarah Lynn overdoses on heroin at the observatory, leaving her lifeless. Interestingly, an Xerox of a Xerox reveals that Sarah Lynn's death occurred at the hospital due to a delayed response from BoJack, rather than on his shoulders that night. In Downer Ending, BoJack frantically seeks closure from Diane, temporarily straining their relationship. In Escape from L.A., BoJack reconnects with Charlotte in New Mexico, forming strong bonds with her and the Carsons over two months. However, he ultimately fails to win her heart, leaving her devastated. Penny follows him on his boat, where they share a tender moment. Time's Arrow shifts focus from BoJack, instead exploring Beatrice Horseman's troubled past, including her debutante ball and meeting Butterscotch Horseman. This episode introduces Henrietta Platchkey, the temporary housemaid who gives birth to Hollyhock before being fired for pregnancy. In The Showstopper, BoJack engages in a violent outburst, strangles Gina Cazador on set, severing their ties. According to an animatic, Song was initially referred to as Wiz Kalifa. Meanwhile, Penny is pursuing higher education at Ohio's Oberlin College. In a quirky off-screen moment, Sarah Lynn sets Ana's ottoman ablaze, replicating her earlier prank on BoJack's ottoman in Prickly-Muffin. Back at college, another student can be spotted reading the jellybean book Kelsey wanted to turn into a film in Old Acquaintance. Additionally, notable changes between episodes include a chaotic living room resulting from the previous party and a broken window caused by BoJack's Tesla mishap - though exterior shots of the house remain unchanged. Notably, Todd and his Cabracadabra employees are no longer present in the living room or kitchen, leaving BoJack solo for the first time in the series.
